I have let the results stand without time penalty. Most people found all the punches - only #22 was sans-punch (I ran out). Certain folks did not find all the punches (and possibly not all the controls) but I have trusted their assurances "I spent ages looking for it, by the way the map is wrong in that area"... hmm. I do accept that there was nothing in the descriptions specifying the height at which the pink flagging tape (aka control marker) would be fixed - all were at knee height or below. There were also discussion over an extra significant tree (competitors' opinion divided) and an unmarked 'massive wall' (again competitors' opinion divided). Not bad for 10 hours total surveying time.

One competitor admitted to accidentally missing out a control and then taking it out of order on the way back - this however would not have affected the classification.

Anyway, we lost some pink tape but no punches - it seems that the very tight cable ties deterred unauthorised punch collection. Best quote of the night "and what does this fluorescent pink flagging tape look like?" - whilst looking directly at a foot length of same gently waving in the breeze not 75cm from questioner's nose. We lost no chopsticks.

Thank you to my control collector (JE) and those who stayed behind until everyone was in and then helped by carrying kit to my car.

David Williams.
