Organiser's comments:

What would probably have been a quite challenging night event on a surprisingly good and technical area was made that bit more interesting by mist so thick that head torches could almost be a hindrance (at least one runner was running with no light at times, claiming they had better visibility). This meant that a course designed to be clearable on a good run by the better orienteers was made much more difficult. Having made the competition particularly challenging, the mist managed to clear after the last competitor got back but before the controls were collected (apparently they were a lot easier to find without it, which was reassuring). It would probably have been a good idea to have had the finish better marked as several people managed to bypass it.

I would like to thank the brave/charitable people who volunteered to go back out and find the controls despite their earlier suffering, and everyone who had kind or constructive (and that does mean constructive – I managed not to upset anyone too much...) comments. I'd also be interested to know if anyone other than a certain Swedish member of the club saw the strange-looking girl standing staring silently at the dying embers of a bonfire in the mist, which is an early contender for the creepiest thing seen on an orienteering course this year.
